A recent membership plea of The Wilderness Society featured a drawing of a lodgepole pine tree and alleged that, on Idaho's Targhee National Forest, "A timber company can buy this tree for less than a dollar." In the next paragraph, the Society said that the Forest Service "will spend nearly three times that amount to make the sale possible," and, therefore, is losing "an average of 65 cents on the dollar" from Targhee timber sales. "Below cost" sales is a major part of their strategy to reduce or eliminate logging, not only on the Targhee, but on all national forests.

If this were true, the average citizen would rightly be outraged by this frivolous use of taxpayer money. If it were true. It is not. Rather than be outraged by an alleged waste of money, the average citizen should more properly be upset by The Wilderness Society's distortions to stop well planned timber sales on the national forests.

First, a word about the tree featured so prominently in The Wilderness Society letter. It is a lodgepole pine, a rather small tree common in the Rockies. On the Targhee, it is most likely either dead or dying, a victim of an epidemic of mountain pine beetles. Stands of dead timber like this contributed to the intensity of the fires in Yellowstone National Park in 1988. Until recently, such timber would have had little market value, and would not have been salvaged. Inevitably, the Targhee would have burned, just as Yellowstone did. Now, however, there are mills which use this timber, manufacturing it into 2x4 "studs" used in new home construction, with over 1,100 people owing their living to timber harvests on the Targhee.

CAN YOU REALLY BUY A TREE FOR A DOLLAR?

Maybe -- if you need a few corral poles and if no one else bids on them to drive up the price. But as a timber company seeking to buy enough timber to keep the mill operating? Then, no. Other companies will want to buy them as well, and the competition at the bidding table will drive the price up considerably. Such competition on a recent sale drove the price up to about four dollars per tree for the Targhee, if one wants to calculate a "per tree" price, or about $80.00 per thousand board feet, as foresters express it. The Forest Service may be willing to accept one dollar per tree as a minimum, but the actual price paid is far greater!

But even the four dollars per tree is not an actual cost. This is the cash amount paid for the timber. On top of that, the purchasing firm must either deposit funds with the Forest Service or pay to dispose of the logging debris, resurface the roads used to haul the logs, and prepare the logged site for reforestation. These logging related activities, all of which are of value to the government, add another $15.68 per thousand board feet (or $0.78 "per tree") to the cost of a Targhee timber sale.

WHAT ABOUT THE FOREST SERVICE'S COSTS -- ARE THEY REASONABLE?

Forest Service costs, as well as the value of the timber that each national forest sells, are displayed each year in a report of the agency's "Timber Sale Program Information Reporting System" (pronounced "tee-spurs," for short). For 1989, we find in TSPIRS that the Targhee National Forest harvested timber on less than 1 percent of the forest's area. Commercial logging, though, totalled 85 million board feet of timber, worth, in cash, $2.8 million.

TSPIRS also shows that the Targhee spent $3.7 million in administering its commercial timber sale program. On paper, then, the Targhee sustained a $978,000 "loss" on its timber sales. Did the Targhee lose nearly a million dollars on its timber sale program? Let's examine TSPIRS a little further. The report shows timber sale operating expenses as follows:
Confused? You’re in good company! Rather than a neat accounting of costs directly associated with timber sales, we have a complex array of costs which are far from self-explanatory. Basically, though, these costs include a variety of items which are not a direct result of timber sales on the Targhee -- agency planning, Washington and regional office overhead, nursery management and genetic research which is not applicable to the Targhee, and the costs of wildlife biologists, archaeologists, and a host of other “ologists” only marginally associated with selling timber, as examples. Even the costs of dealing with environmentalists’ legal challenges to timber sales are included.

WHAT ABOUT THE JOBS PRODUCED BY LOGGING?
One thing is clear in TSPIRS. People’s livelihoods are dependent on logging on the Targhee National Forests -- 1,192 people, to be exact. The value of their employment to the local communities is a cool $22,250,900. No less than $3,337,635 of that is returned to the federal government as income taxes, an amount which closely approaches the total costs of the entire Targhee’s timber management program!

SO DOES THE TARGHEE LOSE MONEY OR NOT?
Let’s go back to the tree that one can supposedly buy for a dollar. This time, let’s do the accounting right. First, the price of the tree is more like four dollars, not one. Add to that the value of road construction or maintenance, plus that of site preparation for reforestation, about 68 cents per tree. Figure also that each tree harvested returns no less than $1.90 just in federal income taxes from the jobs created through its harvest and manufacture into lumber. The total value of the tree to the federal government then, is $6.58, not the single dollar alleged by The Wilderness Society.

And the costs? Even using the Forest Service’s costs -- costs which are inflated by inefficiencies that would never be tolerated in the private sector -- the Targhee is profitable. The $3,747,999 in total operating costs works out to be about $2.20 per tree, leaving the Targhee with a “per tree” profit of $4.38. You can read all about it in TSPIRS.
